“The Heterogeneous Reactions of Household Credit to Income Shocks”

with Elena Loutschina and Daniel Murphy

Abstract: We study how household debt portfolios—aggregated at the ZIP-code level—respond to local income shocks in the United States. We implement two separate identification strategies: (i) a Bartik-style instrument that shifts local earnings via national industry trends, and (ii) a novel instrument leveraging the timing and location of shale oil and gas well discoveries. Across both designs, positive income shocks are, on average, used to reduce debt. This average, however, masks a sharp bifurcation in financial behavior. Deleveraging in total credit is driven by financially healthier households—those with higher credit scores, higher incomes, or lower leverage—who reduce credit-card balances, and auto loans. In contrast, financially vulnerable households often treat the windfall as a gateway to new auto credit while still paying down credit-card and typically mortgage debt. Looking at mixed-profile households, we find strong mortgage leveraging among households with high income and high debt or low credit scores. These results show that the same income shock can trigger balance-sheet repair for some households and additional leverage for others—varying by both borrower type and debt category—underscoring substantial underlying heterogeneity and highlighting barriers to broad-based financial stability.
